

The link between migration and development is more problematic in the case of post-conflict countries of origin.

A globe of the Earth showing continents and oceans. The globe is centered on the Atlantic Ocean, with North and South America visible on the left and Europe and Africa on the right. The text is overlaid on the globe.

Remittances should not be regarded as development potential.

Migrants from post-conflict countries cannot meet the expectations of being politically neutral development actors.

The potential effect of the Dutch migration and development policy is limited by contradicting immigration and integration policies.

Second generation migrants are better equipped to involve in development activities.